CIRI's most recent real estate investment is now a prominent feature on the Anchorage skyline. It took contractors a little more than a month to hoist and assemble the massive steel beams that make up the skeleton frame of the Fireweed Business Center, located at Fireweed Lane and the New Seward Highway.

The topping-out ceremony, which saw the last steel beam hoisted into place, took place July 11. CIRI Board members, staff and contractors inked their signatures onto the final beam before the crane lifted it up.

"It was amazing and thrilling to watch the final beam, a significant milestone of the project, being put into place," said Sophie Minich, president and CEO of CIRI. "We have been impressed with the contractors who fearlessly balance on the beams eight stories high. They have been able to accomplish this monumental feat efficiently and safely."

The general contractor, Davis Constructors and Engineers, said that even with more than 20,000 man-hours on the project there has not been a single lost-time incident.

Along with offering lease space for commercial tenants, the Fireweed Business Center will become CIRI's new corporate headquarters. The move will be the company's first in 37 years. The CIRI Building, where the headquarters are currently located, was CIRI's first major real estate construction project and was completed in 1977.

Pat Marrs, a longtime CIRI Board Member, had just been elected to the Board when the decision was made to move forward with construction of the original CIRI Building.

"It was one of my first meetings and I thought, 'How are we going to do this? We don't have financing,'" Marrs said. "But a couple of Board members and Roy (Huhndorf, then-CIRI president) went to New York and rounded up the money, and we just had the attitude that there's nothing we can't do."

That attitude remains a driving force at CIRI, and real estate remains one of the company's strongest performers, generating revenue to spur growth and support strong dividends for shareholders. 🗨️

31ST ANNUAL CIRI GOLF CLASSIC SEES ANOTHER SUCCESSFUL YEAR

The forecast called for rain, and early morning skies were cloudy, but a cool breeze and persistent sun made for a pleasant day on the green at this year's Annual CIRI Golf Classic, held on August 1.

Since 1983, the CIRI Golf Classic has raised money for worthy charities. This year, the event supported three local organizations: Cook Inlet Native Head Start, The Children's Place in Wasilla and Girl Scouts of Alaska.

With 144 participants and many generous corporate sponsors, the event, now in its 31st year, raised more than $110,000 for local charities.

"The money raised by this event is contributed to local organizations, and we've got a great team who works very hard to make sure the Golf Classic is a big success," said Sophie Minich, CIRI president and CEO. "I'm grateful for the support of other businesses, the volunteers and those who come out to enjoy a game of golf while also getting behind a good cause."

Since 1983, the CIRI Golf Classic has raised money for worthy charities. Early on, proceeds from the event were used to support The CIRI Foundation, which awards scholarships and grants to original CIRI shareholders and their

A WORD FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sophie Minich, CIRI president and chief executive officer

“The new CIRI office building was completed late last year – ahead of schedule and under budget. I believe we can all be proud of this project. We have demonstrated our ability to successfully build, from start to finish, a large, complex project like this without any major difficulty. Starting with raw land, we assembled the building construction team, secured the financing from a major insurance company at highly favorable rates and developed a successful leasing program. This high quality building adds another significant long-term source of income to our portfolio.”

– 1977 CIRI ANNUAL REPORT BY FORMER CIRI PRESIDENT ROY HUHDORF

In 1978, CIRI President Roy Huhndorf wrote the above words for the 1977 CIRI Annual Report. At the time, our company was only six years old, and for most of that time, CIRI headquarters had been located in the former meat locker of an old Piggly Wiggly grocery store on Spenard Road in Anchorage. (Many of you may now know the location today as Play It Again Sports.) Thanks to CIRI’s land entitlements, pursuant to the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act, and smart investments, CIRI was growing quickly. The company needed a home that would accommodate that growth but also allow for continued financial prosperity.

We were a young company that had already seen a great deal of success, and we had an eye on the future. CIRI’s forward-thinking sensibility was embodied in the design of its new headquarters, which was heralded as the first office building in Anchorage to break out of the “box” mold. The reflective glass walls, with their beveled edges and cantilevered corners, gave the building a distinctive shape that made it stand out among the traditional rectangular structures of Anchorage’s skyline.

More than anything, though, the CIRI Building on C Street represented what we, as a company, were capable of accomplishing. Built with the help of shareholders, the CIRI Building became our company’s headquarters and provided a stable source of income as the remaining space was leased. We had not only created a home for CIRI shareholders, descendants and employees, but invested in our future (see photos on page 5).

Thirty-six years later, CIRI has grown into a corporation that is recognized as a model of business success. Once again, we have an eye on the future, as the new Fireweed Business Center enters its next phase of construction. CIRI is on schedule to relocate to its new headquarters in early 2015, and we are actively seeking lessees for the remaining space in the new building.

Like the CIRI Building before it, the Fireweed Business Center will be an innovative building that harnesses the latest technological advancements, maximizes spatial comfort and achieves cost savings through energy efficiency.

Earlier this year, a shareholder mentioned to me that her father had helped with the construction of the CIRI Building in the ’70s. Every time her family drove down C Street, her father would point to the building and say, with pride, “That’s the CIRI Building. That’s your building.”

I’m proud to say that today there are CIRI shareholders and descendants who are swinging steel and scaling the scaffolding, working hard on the completion of our new building. Those shareholders and descendants will soon be able to point to the

CIRI shareholder and employee Johanna Harper doesn’t like the spotlight.

“I like to be the worker in the back, helping to keep things going – which is what I see Walter Harper doing,” she says, referring to her great uncle, the first person to set foot on the summit of Denali, on June 7, 1913. As part of the Stuck-Karstens expedition, Harper reached the summit just ahead of his companions Hudson Stuck, Harry Karstens and Episcopal missionary Robert Tatum.

“The station is so integral to the mountain and that whole area, I am really pleased to be tied to that ranger station, where the Park Service does such incredible work.”

Rochelle Hellmann Introducing CIRI's first Real Estate Intern

"I'm one of those people who isn't great at interviewing," CIRI shareholder and descendant Rochelle Hellman, of Anchorage, admits when she sits down to talk about her experience as the new CIRI Real Estate Intern. "The internship process has always been that shot I need to prove myself."

"This experience has far exceeded any expectation I had. Being able to pick the brains of CEOs, getting to work with all these great companies, having access to professionals who are eager to answer any question I have – not many people get that opportunity. An internship like this is really unparalleled in the industry."

– ROCHELLE HELLMANN

Interning is nothing new for Rochelle. After the company she worked for went out of business, a flyer at the University of Alaska Anchorage inspired her to intern with Weidner Apartment Homes, where she learned the ins and outs of property management. Today, she has a bachelor's of business administration in management, and she's earned her real estate license, with support from The CIRI Foundation and Cook Inlet Tribal Council.

"I view real estate as an economic tool toward making a difference in the lives of Alaska Native people," Rochelle explains. "That's what gets me fired up: using this thing called real estate to really make a difference."

The 12-week real estate internship was designed to help a CIRI shareholder or descendant gain exposure to all facets of the real estate industry. Rochelle will complete nine phases during her internship, each of which will focus on a different aspect of real estate, from project planning to property acquisition, to leasing and management.

Now in her seventh week, Rochelle has already worked with the CIRI real estate team, Cook Inlet Housing Authority (CIHA), RIM First People and Weldin Construction, among other businesses, to gain a broader perspective of the real estate field. Her favorite phase so far has involved working with CIHA, where she learned about financing and construction.

"I'm very good at the big picture, but I need people in my life to show me the details," she

PAY IT FORWARD PHILOSOPHY EARNS NATIONAL RECOGNITION

For its exceptional philanthropic work, The CIRI Foundation (TCF) was honored with the Native Americans in Philanthropy (NAP)'s 2014 Tribal Philanthropy Award. The award recognizes tribal giving programs that practice philanthropic giving grounded in traditional values.

"Pay it forward" is not just a trendy giving philosophy. "At TCF, it's a way of life," says TCF president and CEO Susan Anderson, who is a CIRI shareholder and one of the first recipients of a TCF scholarship.

"Countless recipients have gone on to do amazing things, and in turn, give back to the foundation by becoming TCF ambassadors," she explains. "We are supporting a circle of giving that makes the work we are honored to do very important."

That "circle of giving" embodies an important principle of Native culture, according to the NAP, a national organization that works to advance the role of philanthropy between Native communities and mainstream philanthropy.

Established by CIRI in 1982, part of TCF's mission is to promote individual self-development and economic self-sufficiency through education. Today, TCF's day-to-day operations are grounded in the cultural traditions of supporting and giving to the community. Since its inception, TCF has approved more than $24 million toward post-secondary education, and since the late '80s, has awarded $2.5 million in project grants.

"TCF offers so much more than just financial support," says CIRI shareholder Dr. Jeff Gonnason, who serves as TCF chair and secretary of the CIRI Board of Directors. "In addition to providing mentorships, partnering with other foundations, establishing education programs and attracting national funding to Alaskan programs, TCF is inspiring the next generation of philanthropists."

"Even all of TCF's employees are former scholarship recipients who are now paying it forward," adds Dr. Gonnason. "It's the vision we had 32 years ago when TCF was founded."

Fireweed Business Center
topping-out ceremony

Now...

On July 11, a new chapter for CIRI began with a topping out ceremony at the Fireweed Business Center. In building construction, topping-out is a tradition to commemorate the placement of the final beam. The tradition dates back to ancient Scandinavian times and includes attaching a tree to the final beam. The tradition began when most buildings were constructed with wood and the tree was a symbol to respect the tree-dwelling creatures displaced by the construction. While steel has replaced wood, the tradition remains.

THE CIRI BUILDING

2525 C Street, Anchorage

... and Then

Almost 40 years ago, photographers captured the construction of the CIRI Building, located at 2525 C Street in Anchorage. It was a major investment for a young company that was merely four years old at the time. When it was built, it incorporated some of the most modern architectural features in all of Alaska. Along with serving as CIRI's corporate headquarters, the building has provided decades of strong and stable earnings for CIRI's real estate portfolio.

Last month, Harper was recognized for his historic climb when the National Park Service held a ceremony to rename a ranger station in Talkeetna for him.

"I imagine Walter as a hard worker," Johanna describes. "He was raised in the Native tradition, skilled in hunting, trapping, fishing – everything a person would need to live off the land. Even as a twenty-year-old, he was an experienced guide and became a valuable member of the Stuck-Karstens team. Despite his many capabilities, though, Walter Harper has been described as 'unobtrusive,' so I do wonder if he wouldn't have been a little embarrassed at all this acknowledgment, regardless of how well-deserved it may be."

The renaming ceremony featured several speakers, including Sen. Lisa Murkowski, who introduced legislation to rename the station; Walter Harper's great nephew, Mike Harper; and Johanna's son, Dana Wright, who recreated his ancestor's ascent last summer, on the anniversary of Walter Harper's summit, along with other descendants of the 1913 expedition.

"I definitely got kind of an interactive, historic tour, being able to do the climb with Ken Karstens, who was more or less an expert on the original climb," said Wright of his experience. The renaming, he said, "is a pretty big honor. It's a big step forward in recognizing a story that's gone largely untold, so getting a little credit where credit's due – that's nice for my family, and for Alaska Native people in general."

The Walter Harper Talkeetna Ranger Station serves as the base of operations for Denali National Park's mountaineering operations, with climbers from all over the world passing through its doors each summer.

"The station is so integral to the mountain and that whole area," says Johanna. "I am really pleased to be tied to that ranger station, where the Park Service does such incredible work." 🗨️ direct lineal descendants. When the foundation reached its endowment goal, the focus of the tournament expanded to benefit other worthy programs that focus on youth and education throughout the Cook Inlet region.

This year, the event supported three local organizations. Cook Inlet Native Head Start provides early childhood education and family- and health-related services to the Alaska Native population in Anchorage. The Children's Place in Wasilla is a nonprofit whose mission is to protect children in a nurturing environment through the prevention, evaluation and treatment of child abuse and neglect. Girl Scouts of Alaska allows Alaskan girls of all ages, from all backgrounds, to develop leadership skills, confidence and strength of character.

Our children are our future, and CIRI is proud to support the important work carried out by these organizations in support of youth and education. 🍴

"The money raised by this event goes to contribute to local organizations, and we've got a great team who works very hard to make sure the Golf Classic is a big success."

Tax Reminder

As a reminder, CIRI does not withhold taxes from distributions; however, shareholders who anticipate owing tax on their distributions have the option of making quarterly estimated tax payments directly to the IRS. To find out more about applicable federal and state tax requirements or making quarterly estimated tax payments, please consult with a tax advisor or contact the IRS directly.
